1. After American military authorities banned the sale in Germany of the pro-Nazi magazine, Der Weg (The Way) which is published in Buenos Aires, the publishers evolved a scheme to circumvent this control.* Articles from the magazine are printed in pamphlet form and distributed to subscribers in various Latin American countries, who in turn enclose the pamphlets in letters to friends and relatives in Germany.
2. Der Weg, a German-language magazine published by Editorial Durer located at Calle Sarmiento 542, Buenos Aires, resumed publication after having been suspended during the latter part of the war. It receives articles for publication from Germany and Spain, the articles from Spain having come from the Instituto Ibero-Americano in Madrid. Eberhard Fritsch, its director, was a prominent Nazi in Argentina during the war. He is assisted by Gustav Friedl, also a Nazi, and Hans Muller, who was formerly employed by the Nazi publication La Plata Zeitung. Der Weg aims to revive the hopes and ambitions of defeated Nazis.
3. Source furnished copies of six reprints in German from Der Weg entitled:
 - a. "The Last Days of the Reich," by Graf Schwerin von Krosigk, Federal Minister of Finance in Nazi Germany;
 - b. "The Union of Soviet Republics," by Dr. Hans Maler;
 - c. "The Conversation of the German Reichs Chancellor, Admiral Doenitz, with his Advocates at Nuremberg";
 - d. "The World Political Importance of the Nuremberg Trial Against I. G. Farben," by Max Hochleitner;
 - e. "Atomic Energy," by Professor Dr. Wilhelm Westphal;
 - f. "What Do We Think About It," an anonymous German letter.

4. The last pamphlet, which attacks the Western Powers and particularly the Bonn Government, included an appeal to the German people to revolt openly should they fail to receive a government which they considered just. It stated, "Because the entire world is responsible for the present fate of Germany, the goal of the German Revolution, which has been developing since 1914, must be the entire world."
